

Why Trees are Important to the Environment

Trees, don't you think they are great? The trees in the world make a difference, not just for us, but for all the things they do. Right now I am writing on a desk. That desk could not have been made without our wonderful trees. The earth is surrounded by our healthy green trees. Trees help the world go around, but they are also a big tourist attraction. The Great Redwood Tree in California is tall, big enough to drive a car through, and wow, is it beautiful!

No one would live on planet earth, if there were no trees. The tree itself provides oxygen to both animals and humans. It also gives of itself by providing food for wildlife, and wood for homes or furniture for humans. We shouldn't just tear down trees we should replant some. This would help the incredible wildlife creatures find homes. Birds can make nests, beavers build dams, squirrels climb, and many other animals find homes or food in the trees. Your office chair, your desk and your tables, almost everything around you is made from trees. The tree not only provides things for us but we all need the trees to survive.

The trees also support many things on earth that are not necessary, but appreciated in our daily lives. The tree helps support the world structure. The paper we write on comes from trees. The leaves that fall to the ground after a fall season are so amazing! The leaves have such wonderful colors. These colorful leaves can make a child so happy when they get the chance to jump in those leaves! The tree brings joy, happiness, and life to the earth. Let us all try to keep the trees happy and growing.
